Did The UK Create A New Kind Of "Crypto Mule"

CYBERCRIME IS VIEWED as a serious threat to the prosperity and security of developed states, prompting the adoption of cyber security strategies across a range of countries.[1] Although some malicious cyber activities are carried out in the pursuit of military or political objectives,[2] a high proportion of cybercrime is financially motivated. According to one report, this was the case for 76% of all data breaches in 2017.[3]

Cyber threats, including those that emanate from serious and organised crime, are deemed to pose a Tier 1 national security threat in the UK.[4] The UK government's multi-pronged response is based on the three principles of 'Defend', 'Deter' and 'Develop'. In line with this, measures to ensure the security of the country's networks and data ('Defend') are complemented by efforts to 'detect, understand, investigate and disrupt hostile action' ('Deter').[5]

Accordingly, the UK government has vowed to dismantle the financial infrastructure of cybercrime and thereby '[add] friction to the criminal business model'.[6] Doing so requires the development of an intelligence picture of cybercrime-related money laundering, drawing on the resources of law enforcement agencies (LEAs) and the information supplied by businesses that are subject to AML obligations (regulated entities).
